

RULE OF LAW IN EUROPE ENDANGERED BY UNREST

Guglielmo Ferrero, Italian Historian, Says Reds Must Be Suppressed by Force.

ON HORNS OF A DILEMMA

Feels That Disturbed Condition of Italy Threatens the Soothing, Though Smothered, Discontent in Other Nations of Europe.

BY GUGLIELMO FERRERO, Famous Italian Historian.

(Written for Universal Service.)

ROME, Sept. 25.—The initial stage of a declaration of war is being over, the chamber has at last begun to legislate. July and August are the first months during which the new chamber has not been in strike and perfectly idle. This does not mean that Italy is already saved from all the dangers that threaten her, but what has been gained is not little.

In the article I published in this paper about two months ago, when Nitti's ministry was on the point of dissolution, which dealt precisely with the question of the future of the chamber was a good or a bad one, it was absolutely necessary to overcome the paralysis from which it was suffering if it was seriously desired to save the country. That counsel was to attempt to do it by force, and to understand how it happened that no many papers, and even certain deputies, could consider it as an act of rebellion, it is the function of the law to oppose a certain stability and force that the chamber has at last achieved. But they can only attain such force and stability at what in the epoch, is the hour of legality; the will of the sovereign, in the old absolute monarchies, was the will of the people and the parliament, which are the official mouthpieces today.

Nothing left but force, but also this source is dried, just as it is that of times gone by; who can doubt it? But this time there is nothing left but force, whence comes the dilemma, either Parliament or a military dictatorship, either white. The whole of Europe is gripped between the horns of this dilemma.

For some time the war enabled the decree to be substituted for the law, and the will of the single individuals, through whom, time by time, the government is made, is substituted for the will of the people. The decree, the minister, the high functionaries, generally, to be substituted for the will of the people. These persons were often invisible and hid in unknown offices; but now they are visible, and are being substituted for the will of the people. The decree, the minister, the high functionaries, generally, to be substituted for the will of the people.

The nation felt bound to obey this invisible will, even when it seemed to it that it erred. But this spirit of obedience has disappeared with the organ of it has been partly destroyed and partly weakened; the decrees have been cried their last command, listening to them. It is from these facts that comes Nitti's incredible mistake, to believe that he could deal with enormous affairs like the reorganization of the army and the death duties by dictatorial decree, when the organs and the very spirit of dictatorship were no longer in existence.

Slight Gain Made. We still, then, have a Parliament. The ancient faint of legality has dried up. The Hon. Giolitti has convinced the doubtful of this by facts. This is the gain that the last months and the ministry has brought us.

It must not be thought, however, that the disease from which the state is suffering—that crisis of authority that is afflicting the whole of Europe—is cured. It would be dangerous to delude oneself—the fiction, if we want to use a proper word, the mystic mystery of the will of the people on which the authority of Parliament and the whole of the present political order rests, is greatly discredited today and might become a mortal danger tomorrow. After many trials and hesitations, Europe has reached the point where the logic of principle was reached, and has recognized the organ of the national will, which delegates its powers to Parliament. In the most universal suffrage, that is, in the suffrage of the total number of men and women we have reached the age of reason, all together, and what ever may be their education or social condition.

First Appearance. But what institution or principle, what political or religious tradition, what tradition may presume today, not to dominate or direct, but even to limit or divide the common will of these endless multitudes, which are every little while convoked to rejuvenate by the act of will, the principle of authority which they have to obey? This will, which appears now for the first time in history, is an enormous force, obscure to every one and even to itself—indolent, fitful, oscillating. It ought to support the world, and it is at the mercy of the most feeble impressions. It is the queen of the universe, and is always in danger of falling a slave to a handful of rash persons, who know how to exploit its light and irresponsible caprices. In many, many ways it may be interpreted. In how many ways may it be surprised, deceived, abused, violated?

Spirit of Violence Comes. In the shade of their old parliamentary regimes, the peoples of western Europe are still living under the empire of a law which is fairly equal and liberal.

But the spirit of violence and arrogance is blowing like a wind from every part of the world, and the law is in serious danger. In the disturbed times in which we are living, just because it is old, it would appear, therefore, that we ought to do our utmost to render our political institutions as sound as possible, reforming any part of them that has become vitiated and renewing what is old.

Barn and Contents Burn. FREDRICKSBURG, Va., Sept. 25.—Fire of unknown origin destroyed a large barn on Richard Bayler's farm at Port Micon, on the Rappahannock River in Essex County, Thursday night. A quantity of hay and the building were totally destroyed. All horses and other live stock were saved.

Last of Season's Outings. The last of the season's Chesapeake and Ohio Sunday outings will be held today to Norfolk and the seaside. A number of Richmonders have availed themselves of these excursions throughout the summer.

SEIBOLD, ACE OF REPORTERS, ON THE PRESIDENTIAL BATTLE

He Is Putting the Situation in a Nutshell in Specials to The Times-Dispatch.

Louis Seibold, chief political writer of the New York World, is one of the leading figures in American journalism. From the time he was a cub reporter on the Rocky Mountain News, 'way back in '88, he has followed his predilection for politics.

As New York correspondent of the Chicago Evening Post he dealt mostly with politics. Twenty-seven years ago the New York World employed him on local politics, and later made him for many years Albany correspondent, where again it was politics. He outgrew State politics and took to general politics.

For twenty-four years he has been at the national conventions of both parties, writing the lead stories. Wherever the political activity has been greatest, there Seibold has turned, as the magnetic needle turns to the lodestone. He has loved politics, lived for it, and has mastered its main forces. "To get the facts and write them" is all he concerns himself with. He is absolutely free from partisanship; he has no leaning to one side or the other. He knows all the leading national politicians personally, and is saturated with facts of their careers, their opinions, their ambitions and their connections.

He takes pride in the title "reporter," which he has helped to render illustrious. Having no taste for executive work, he has shunned editorial positions. He never would take even the management of the Washington bureau. His achievements have given him the right to a goodly share of conceit, but he is extremely modest, and asserts himself only in his work.

His large acquaintance is a large part of his capital, and he draws from it constant and valuable dividends of inside information.
